THE END

THE TIGER'S BROTHER

The slouching detective standing at the corner of Walnut and Voorhies Avenue stared impassively at the four young punks on the opposite corner. They were garbed in rainbow hues, bright red shirts, gaudy green trousers and suede shoes. And their hair was as carefully marcelled as a bride's.

They looked like sissies, he thought bitterly, but actually they reminded him of the stealthy, brightly colored tigers and leopards in the jungle. Gaudy or not, they were deadly in their gang fights, deadlier when they selected a victim to rob. Inside the tailored shirts he might find a knife or a gun and beneath their shirts, in their hearts, the will to use them!

One obviously led the rest. His jacket was the brightest, his hair the longest, and his slim, hard face the handsomest. And his heart was the blackest! He was Rocky Bennet, the Tiger's brother. And the Tiger was in Sing Sing waiting for the chair with the metal straps and the fatal electrodes.

First grade detective Anthony Lorrio got both feet under him and angled across the street toward the group. He didn't have any charges against them even though he was sure Bennet's gang was behind the recent wave of holdups in his district. They waited and Lorrio wished bitterly that one of them would scurry off or try to evade him but all four stood their ground.

Rocky eyed him stonily, his heavily tanned face impassive. Lorrio went through the group making them give way, then he turned suddenly and faced Rocky Bennet.

"I was up to see the Tiger, Rocky. He said to give you his regards. And to tell you to keep your nose clean so you don't get a cell next to his."

"That's a lie, Lorrio. The Tiger doesn't talk to cops! Hay, lay off!" He said the last as Tony suddenly pinned him against the wall and expertly ran his hands over his jacket, beneath his arms and down his thighs. Then he laughed. "You thought you'd get me on a Sullivan rap? I'm not that stupid!"

Tony Lorrio looked at him wearily, then stepped back a little and talked to all of them. "I'm not trying to 'get' anyone! I'm doing my job of protecting the public — and I'm also trying to keep you fatheads from getting into trouble. Bad trouble, like the kind the Tiger has!"

One of them, Carlos O'Brien, laughed cynically. "You're just trying to get a pinch, Lorrio. You're after us to make the headlines, bringing in Tiger Bennet's old gang."

They turned and followed Rocky Bennet down the street and Lorrio felt a thousand years old as he watched four young men in their early twenties walking toward a life of destruction and misery. He lit the last of his cigarettes and headed back to the squad precinct.

At the squadroom, Tony sought out Artie Fives, the inspector of their district. Artie was a blocky man of medium height and his tie was as neat as it had been that morning and his white shirt unwrinkled, unsoiled. He grinned at Tony's slouch and waved him to a scarr-ed chair across the plain table from him.

"You look as though your wife lost the rent money on the horses, Tony," he laughed. "Sit down and forget the crumbs you deal with all day."

Tony Lorrio didn't return the smile. He felt far from happy. Some of the cops he knew could leave their jobs when they finished but Tony always had the million details in the back of his mind. He slumped in a chair and futilely hunted a cigarette till Artie offered him one and he lit it.

"Who is it, Tony? The Bennet gang?"

Tony nodded and took a deep drag. "Those guys are headed for trouble, Artie. They're working their way up into the bigger jobs."

Artie nodded. Edson was the office guard who'd courageously tried to stop the three armed young men who had held up the company. He'd never seen the fourth in the corner who had coolly snapped the shot that hit him in the shoulder.

"You can't change the world, Tony. All we can do is keep poking and prying and hope we'll get them before they kill someone. What else can you do? You got no other way to do it."

Tony sighed and slid down further on his spine. "The only one who can help us was the worst of the bunch. If Tiger Bennet would only soften up, he might be able to help."

Fives thought about it awhile. "We've frisked them a hundred times. If only we could hang a small rap on one or more of them, we might throw a scare into the others. Look, Tony. They always have a gun somewhere within reach. If we could only catch them with one, we'd have our leverage."

Tony thought about it, eyes half closed against the curling smoke. "I'm going up to see Bennet tomorrow. The execution is in three days so maybe the prison chaplain has cracked his shell."

Lorrio was gone for two days. He was back in the precinct on the eve of the execution of the Tiger. Artie Fives found him in his chair in the squad room at headquarters.

"Any luck, Tony? I hope you found something because I'm pretty sure it's the Bennet gang who's been pulling a string of liquor store hold-ups."

"I think I can get 'em all, Artie. Do you want to work with me tonight? I'll fill you in with what I've got on the way."

They used Artie's car, not known to the four hoodlums and parked near Voorhies Ave. The hoodlums were assembling, three of them on the corner but now dressed in less conspicuous clothes.

Then Rocky appeared and they went into a huddle. They chatted and then hailed a cab. A girl Artie had not noticed before watched them leave before she went to the bus stop and boarded the next bus uptown. Artie looked at Tony. "She the one? Ellen Ward?"

"She's the one, Artie. A nice clean looking kid who thinks the sun rises when Rocky snaps his fingers. We'll tail her. She's our key now, Artie."

They tailed the bus until the girl got off in the mid-town area. In her crisp tailored suit, carrying a knitting reticule, she looked like any other office worker who had worked late that evening.

"Park the car, Artie. I can't afford to take a chance on losing her. She's probably headed for the Central Liquor store in the next block."

Tony lounged in a doorway and watched the girl slowly drift down the block, window-shopping and glancing often at her watch. Artie came about a hundred feet behind trying to look like an idle stroller.

Then Tony tensed. Rocky Bennet appeared, looked around, then made a signal to the others around the corner. They came around casually just as the girl neatly timed her arrival at the entrance to the store.

Artie was moving faster now, but wasn't close enough to scare them. Tony started across the street watching the four file by the girl. She had removed the top of the straw basket and, as the quartet passed her, each of them dipped a hand in and took a gun. It was quick and the guns were quickly palmed but Tony saw every movement in the brightly lighted doorway.

He broke into a run then and brushed past the girl. She was startled and started to yell when Artie Fives got to her. "Shut up, lady. If you warn them, someone's going to get hurt. And it might be your precious Rocky!"

He got inside just as Tony used his blackjack on the forearm of Rocky Bennet and covered the others with his gun in his left hand. The three turned slowly and Rocky grew scarlet with rage.

"Somebody ratted! How'd you know Ellen carried the guns?"

Tony grinned. "Somebody did rat, Rocky. How many knew about the girl's part of the job. You and one other!"

They looked at each other, then Rocky got it. "You're a liar! The only other one who knew about it was"

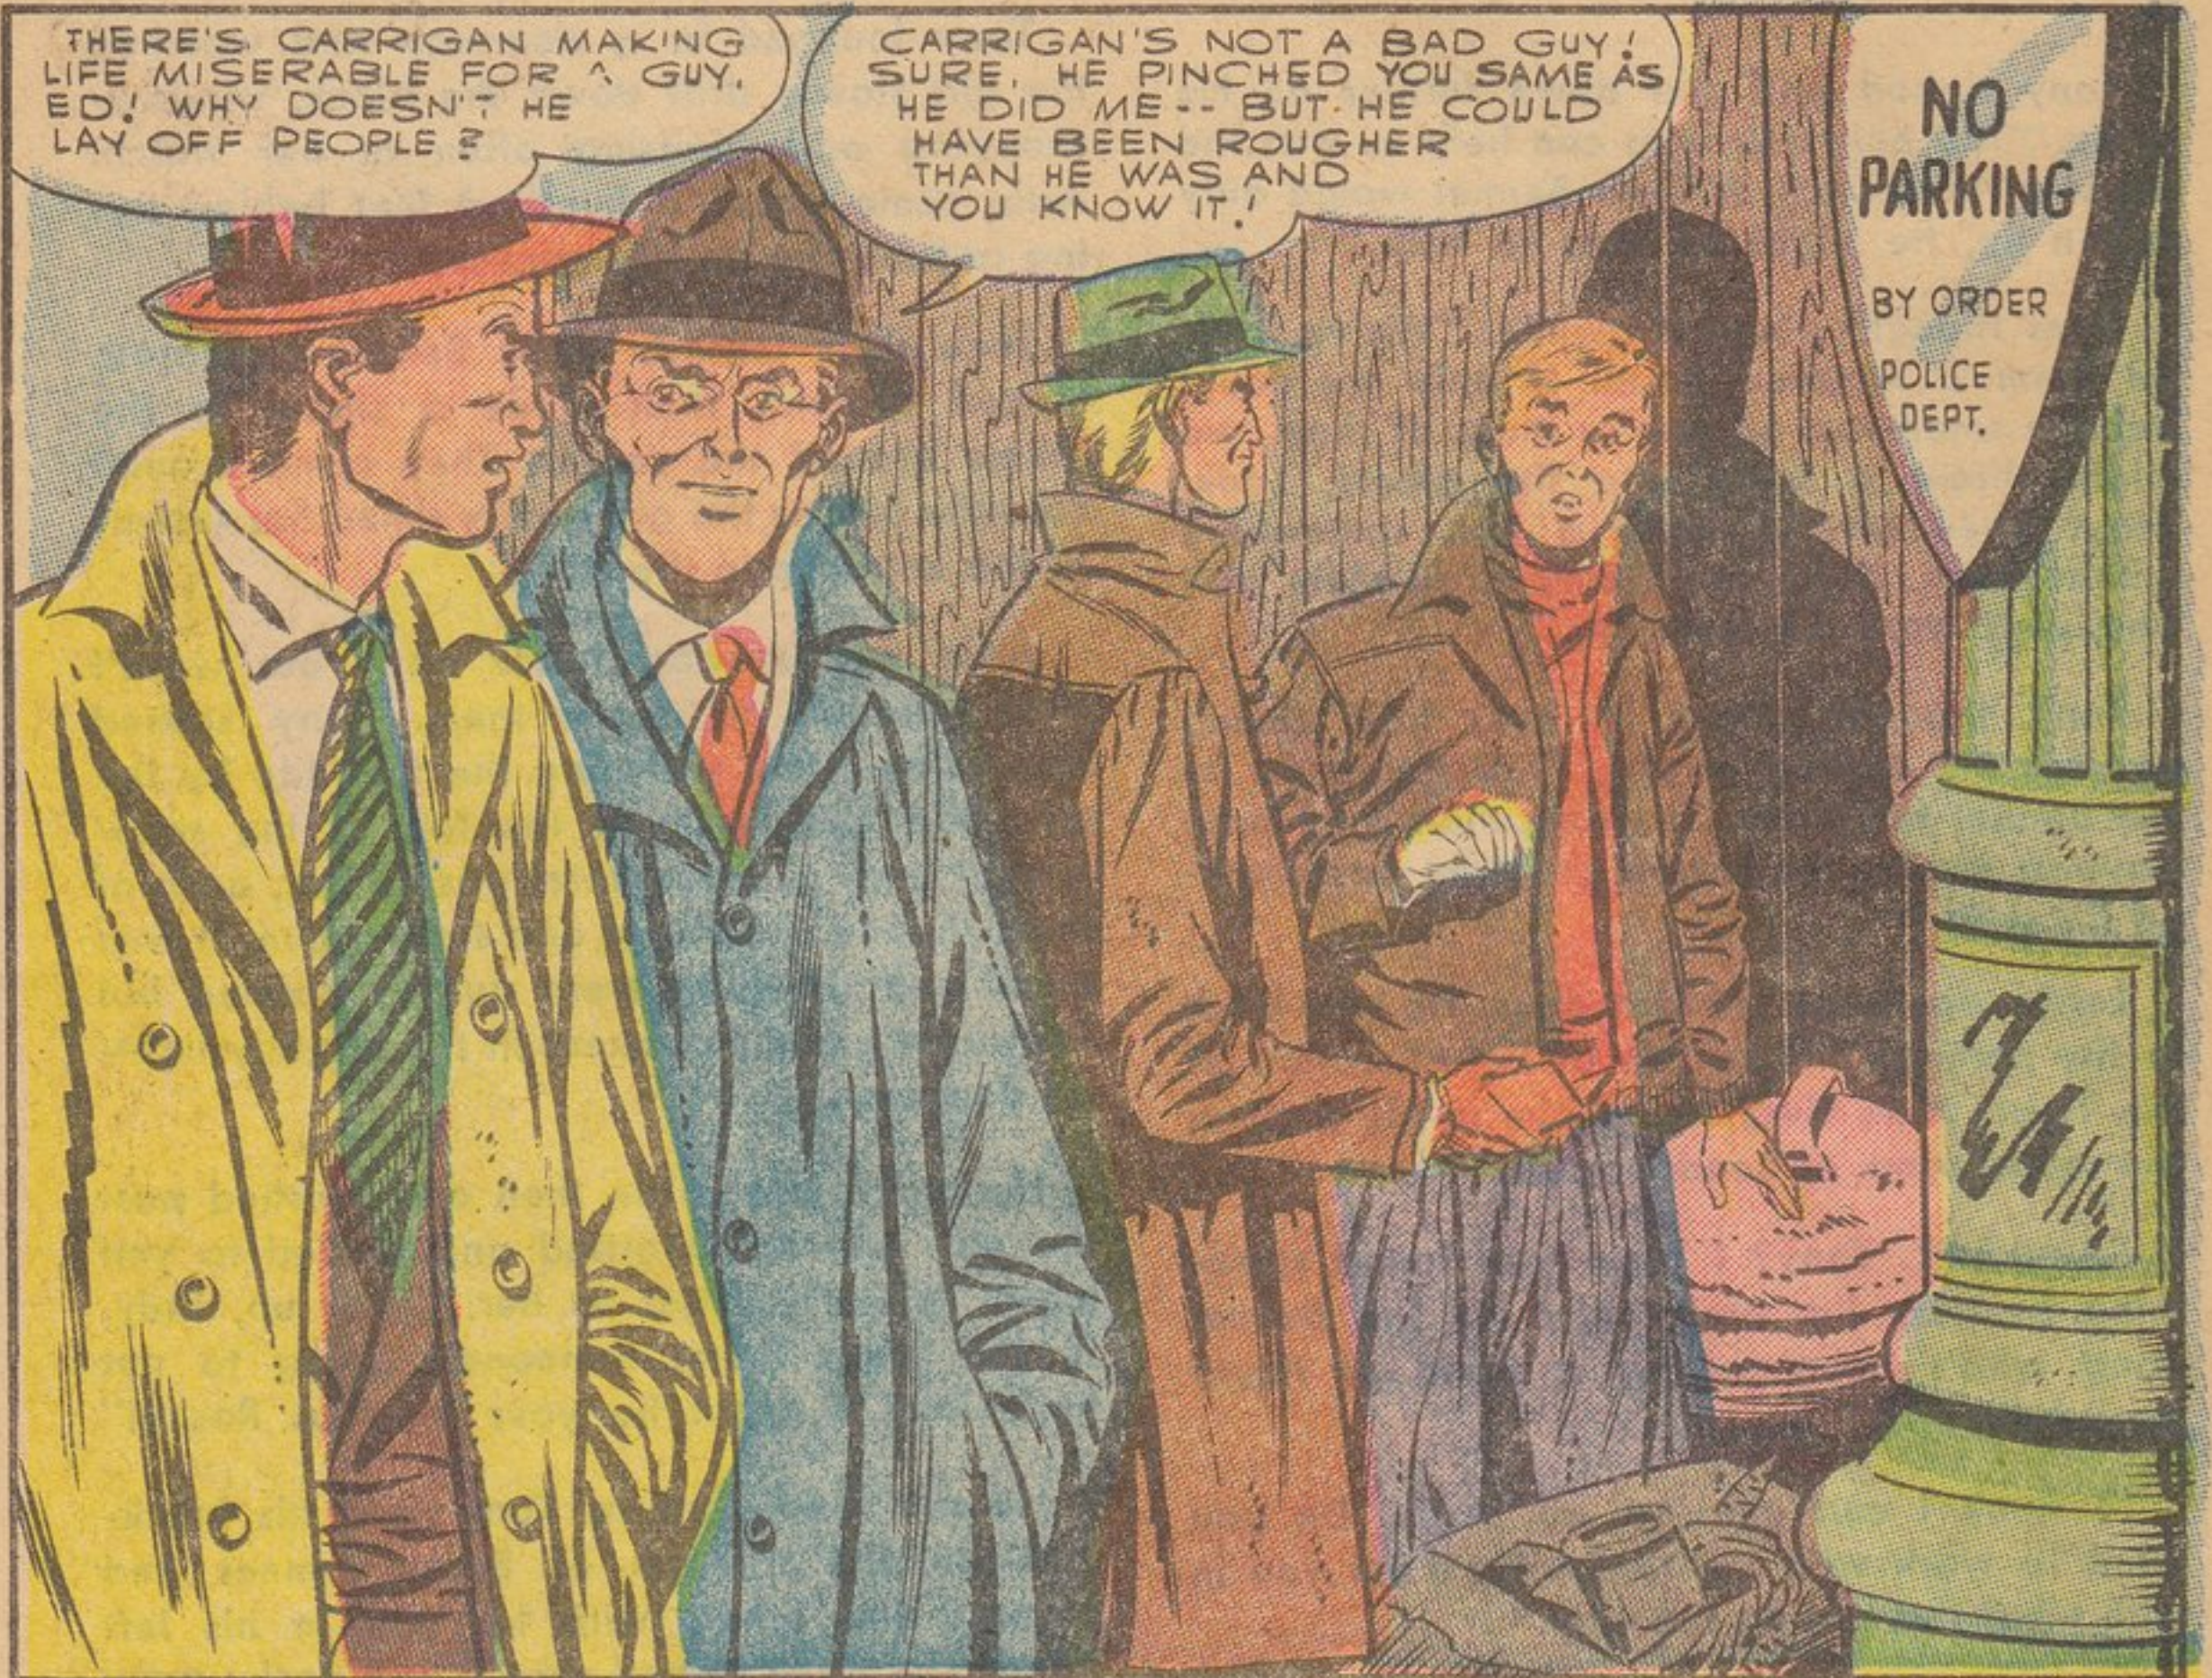

"Tiger Bennet! I finally convinced him that the Death House was no place for his kid brother! Maybe you boys'll have sense by the time you get out!"
